

JUNIUS BRUTUS BOOTH.

A Series of Interesting Anecdotes About the Celebrated Tragedian—Quer Freaks that Can Be Attributed Only to an Unbalanced Mind.

The memory of a great actor never dies. So long as the traditions of the stage last, so long will the remembrances of the artist be kept green, and the transmission of his fame, from one generation to another, will be handed down to the last syllable of mortal time. At this remote period of the world's history we do not forget when Roscius was an actor in Rome, and there can be no doubt that the name of Junius Brutus Booth, the elder, will dwell in the minds of men as long as that of the great Roman player. It is beyond a peradventure that Mr. Booth was one of the greatest geniuses and most remarkable actors of the English and the American stage. Born at St. Pancras, London, on the 1st of May, 1796, he made his first appearance on the American stage at Richmond, Va., as the 5th of July, 1821, in the character of Richard III., and he died on board the steamer, J. S. Chenowith, on the Mississippi river, on Tuesday, Nov. 30, 1852. It is just a coincidence that he died on the same day that he was unknown to the present generation of playgoers, yet there are multitudes still alive who remember him in the maturity of his powers, while there can be no doubt that there are still some in existence who can almost call to mind his first appearance among us. He was a scholar, and a ripe one; a man most eratic in his nature, and it is beyond a question that his vivacity and quaintness—were numerous, says a writer in the Boston Herald, and first lets touch on what were undeniably his freaks of insanity. At the very outset of his career in this country he gave evidence that there was a screw loose somewhere. As old Tony Weller desired to "keep a light-house," so did Mr. Booth for his career on the stage, for the purpose of keeping a lighthouse. There can be no doubt about this, as will be seen from the following memorandum of his, dated Feb. 12, 1822: "Spoke to Mr. Blount, collector of customs, and one of the passengers, about Cape Hatteras lighthouse. He offered it to me with the dwelling-house and twenty acres of land for $10,000 per annum, for keeping the light—governor providing oil and cotton—a quart per diem. Grapes, watermelons, cabbages, potatoes, carrots, and onions grow in abundance there. Rain water the only drink, a cistern on the premises for that purpose. Abundance of fish and wild fowls; pigs, cows, and horses find good pasture. Soil too light for wheat or corn, but good for oats $5 a barrel. The office is for sale, and the house through misbehavior. Lighthouse seventy-five feet high; light requires trimming every night at 12 o'clock. No taxes whatever. Firewood is procured from the pieces of wreck found on the shoals. One dollar a day is the charge for men who assist in cases of wreck. Strawberries, currant bushes and apple trees grow abundantly. There are also a great many other articles of value. Dine tables, chairs, &c., the best. Mr. Blount is to write me word if the office can be given me April next, from his seat at Washington, North Carolina." This freak reached the ears of various theatrical managers, who put their heads together, and the result was that Booth did not become a lighthouse keeper, and he was preserved to the stage.

The Atlantic Monthly for September, 1861, Rev. James Freeman Clarke relates a strange adventure with the tragedian. Mr. Clarke in his young days was pastor of a church in one of the western cities. He was sitting one evening in his room, when a negro boy presented him with a note, of which the following is a copy:

"UNITED STATES HOTEL, Jan. 4, 1834.—Sir: I hope you will excuse the liberty of addressing you on a subject which he feels it to be a place of honor to have.

"I am desirous to acquire a place of lodgings for my friend, Mr. Booth, and also the expenses attendant on the purchase of such place of temporary residence. Your communication on this matter will greatly oblige, sir, your respectful and obedient servant,

J. B. BOOTH."

In compliance with the terms of the note, Mr. Clarke called on Mr. Booth at his hotel, and found him and another gentleman in a private parlor, seated at a table with wine and cigars between them. After a short pause together, during which Mr. Booth recited a number of extracts from various writers, the tragedian suddenly exclaimed: "Would you like to look at the remains?" Mr. Clarke assented, and being led into an adjoining room, where he expected to see a corpse, saw instead, spread out upon a large sheet, about eight or ten feet square, a dead bird. On entering he met Booth, who said, "I have every evidence of sincere affection, both to mourn over them, taking them up tenderly in his hands and pressing them to his heart. You see," said Booth, "these innocent victims of man's barbarity. I wish to testify in some public way against this wanton destruction of life. And I wish you to help me. Will you, sir, be my witness?" Mr. Clarke assented, saying that he did not care to be called in as a witness to the effects of liquor, as his attendants, who had been with him through the day, averred that he had tasted nothing of a spirituous kind.

"Mr. Booth was immediately carried to his lodgings, and his disorder having increased, it was on Wednesday deemed advisable to obtain a consultation as to the propriety of placing him in a lunatic asylum. And on repairing to the office he was not to be found."

The above incident occurred on the night of the 7th of December, 1829, at the Tremont theater.

And now occurred the famous walk to Providence. As we have said, search was made for Booth, but without effect, and the only information obtainable was that he had made application at the Marlboro hotel for a seat in the stage coach to Providence, and it wasascertained after his arrival that he had affording passage to any part of the city for 25 cents. Passenger fare on the Cable road only 5 cents.

Washing Letter.

The new senator from New York finds many of his old acquaintances here, and his family renew the friendships made when Senator Clark was in the Senate under the Hayes administration.

To one who has heard of the death of Mr. Adams, his loss is a great blow to the theatre in season to begin the performance, and Mr. Adams, the manager, guided by one of the clerks of the hotel, went to the room and found it locked. To their calls and knocks there was no response, but as it was possible he had fallen asleep, the clerk climbed upon the roof and was heard that he was safe and sound.

The room was apparently empty. Then the corridors and offices were visited without success and the manager was about to go away in disappointment when the clerk, to make assurance doubly sure, again sealed the piazza, entered the window and looked under the bed. There was the missing tragedian, still and sober, with his hands clasped behind his back. He was soon consigned to the theater and after a few preparations followed the manager, who relying on his promise had hastened back to his post. The clerk, impervious to those who call this week. This is the last week, and last chance to learn this system free.

Notice of Special Tax Bills.

On Dec. 14, 1861, Public notice is hereby given that the amount of tax bills amounting to $70,749 was issued to Robert Chambers, contractor, for completing the following public improvements, viz.: 1846, Booth indulged in more of his vagrancy. He lodged at the City hotel, and his strange demeanor was a constant source of amusement to all. One night he was found dead in the cemetery two or three miles below the city, that he had a coffin made, hired a horse and carriage, and had gone through all the solemnity of a regular funeral. For several days he continued to visit the grave of his little friends, and mourned over them with a grief which did not seem at all theatrical. His degeneracy proved to be too temporary, and his son was soon in fact dead. It might be said here that Mr. Chapman sold these facts originally to The Boston Post, published in this city in 1834, and the Boston Daily Spy, subsequently amplified for The Atlantic.

The late Isaac C. Fray relates another instance. He says: "In Boston, during the stage management of Mr. William H. Smith, Mr. Booth was announced to follow a short season of comedy, performing some of his most effective tragic plays. 'Evadne' was the first of these performances. The house was crowded. At the precise moment when Ludovico should enter, Mr. Booth promptly appeared and the immense audience gave him an 'impressive reception.' He did not heed the plaudits, but moved forward, and turning abruptly up the stage, found on a door a knocker. It had been used the night before in a comedy. The noisy property seemed at the time to be a mere accident. Mr. Booth then the play of 'Evadne' on the stage, and what he had come to see it. He seized it and gave a London gentleman's rat-tat-tat, surprising every one familiar with the scene on which he had entered. A pause ensued. Then Mr. Booth came toward the footlights, and said with imperious coolness: 'Ladies and gentlemen, it appears that there is nobody here.' Muffled in the hall, hailed with unanimous applause by the audience, whose patience he had so severely tried. Another time he evaded the watchful eyes of his friends, and after an ineffectual search in the various bar rooms of the city, was found sitting on Peck's wharf, with a parcel of crackers from which he was feeding a number of dogs.

NEW HAVEN, Conn. Jan. 11.—In the town of North Haven there has been for the last thirty years rumors of strange and supernatural sights in the vicinity of Shafer's brickyard. Many men and women who have been referred to might have been said to have been hoodwinked, and was frequently said that he exhibited similar aberrations of mind. The perfection of his mimicry showed that he was under no alcoholistic influence, for no man can place himself before the public upon the stage, even in a slightly intoxicated condition, without being betrayed by his eyes, which they had seen were received with incredulity by some, and others would put faith in the stories. Night before last, Owen McNulty, an Irishman; Oscar Jansen, a Swede; Septi Capponi, Pasco Service, and Lorenzo Parrotta, three Italian workmen, at the Chatham street, were engaged to stop the brickyard, were going home about half past ten o'clock in the evening. Suddenly there appeared in the road before them the figure of a man about three feet high dressed in black velvet clothes of the fashion of 100 years ago. The coat was trimmed with fur, and on his head was a cocked hat that McNulty had a spade on his shoulder. He said to Boys, "Gentlemen I'll stop the chapp," and so saying, ran up to the figure with his spade, but it passed through and the dwarf vanished. The men were much frightened, and crossing themselves, fled home. They went the next day to see if their senses had played them false, when the figure appeared again in the full light of day. McNulty suggested to the object, The German papers speak of a new language—"Tongaline". It is based on living languages, in that all that contains either now exists or has lived, and down to to-day has remained an actual element. The system of the philologist Steiner is, on account of its relationship to modern tongues, regarded as the most exact. "Voliwick" of Schleier, which in comparison, said to be outlandish. The "Pasingline" is a mixture of ancient and romance elements—the mixing, however, being done on scientific principles—yet it is esoteric is not disputed. It is claimed to be a language for adults, and it is especially commended to travelers, commercial men, conductors of ships, etc., who are thrown into contact with persons of a nationality different to their own. It is proposed at an early date to issue a French edition of the Pasingline grammar from Paris, and later an English edition to be printed in New York. The simplicity of the dictionary is shown by the fact that it is necessary to give the root forms for the most necessary parts of the adjectives, and all stems derived from them, as verbs, etc., are then formed after grammatical rules.
